Planetbase. This study focuses on the possible mechanism(s) of cellular iron toxicity due to the administration of deferoxamine (DFO) to rats. The induction of lipid peroxidation (LPO) by DFO is well established, although the mechanism(s) of toxicity is not understood. Presently, by monitoring a number of biochemical parameters we plan to: 1) examine the contribution of LPO to the cytotoxicity of DFO; 2) determine which oxidant-reducing agents are responsible for DFO-induced toxicity; 3) examine whether DFO requires metabolic activation in order to induce toxicity. Using the isolated rat liver perfusion system, the toxicokinetics of DFO in vivo will be examined. Additionally, we will utilize available catalase preparations to examine whether peroxidative tissue damage is determined by conversion of catalase to heme catalase. Finally, we will investigate whether or not DFO modifies the incorporation of iron into cellular iron containing proteins. The results obtained from the various models will be used to develop a strategy for the prevention and treatment of toxic iron overload.
